(You may need to close an open visual studio instance to save this.) Now, every time direct3d renders a scene, it will do so in your chosen colour range. It's not very clear whether this will affect lighting but I'd bet that it would, and that it would certainly help render some effects (such as the effects created by changing between textures in your shaders). Alternatively, you could create a new surface() in a separate program and output the content to it before calling your program's main d3d draw. This would be less portable but probably a bit easier. \ f678ea9f9e
